STUDENT REFLECTION

Conflict and Transformation: Navigating the Middle East's Shifting Geopolitical Landscape"

The Middle East is still a region with both deep conflict and vibrant political upheaval. Central to much tension is the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, which has been going on for decades. Gaza flare-ups in recent times have led to high casualties and repeated global demands for a two-state solution. But political disintegration within Palestinian factions and Israel's changing policies still make progress difficult.

In parallel, Iran and Israel are becoming increasingly mired in an escalating showdown. Israel's pre-emptive attacks against Iranian suspected nuclear targets, and Iran's retaliations-targeting U.S. interests in the region among others-have heightened concerns of an expanded conflict. These ceasefires brokered, though, are fragile and short-lived.

The Gulf states, Saudi Arabia, the UAE, and Qatar in particular, have moved from being oil-endowed monarchies to diplomatic players in their own right. Qatar's brokering between Israel and Iran, and Saudi Arabia's changing policy towards regional coalition-building, are examples of a new diplomacy shift towards negotiation and soft power. They are also building closer relations with world powers, balancing Western and rising new partners such as China. At the same time, public opinion throughout the Arab world is becoming increasingly outspoken, particularly with respect to Palestinian rights. This is putting pressure on governments which have normalized relations with Israel via the Abraham Accords to revisit their approaches. The United States is still a primary actor, albeit its own influence is being tested by regional actors exercising greater autonomy and by China's more subtle economic and diplomatic expansion.

In the end, the Middle East is moving through a new period. There is still conflict, but still also transformation. The course of the region will hang on the interplay among grassroots protests, government strategies, and international diplomacy-all taking place in a context where the past is ever-visible and the future is always uncertain.
